Dirty Linen

Airing your dirty linen in public, as the saying goes, is not the done thing. It's embarrassing forcing your base thoughts and secrets on a passer-by, and it's fuel-to-the-fire for the neighbourhood gossips. But getting rid of the dirty odour is surely the priority. It's healthy and can be cathartic. Better to clear the air than let it fester, that's what I say. And if everyone else knows about it, so what? The more the merrier. Let them gossip amongst themselves. My sheets may be filthy, but I bet they've seen more action than YOURS!!!

Sluice is proud to present an exhibition by Paul Cole. Paul's confessional series of new works are part of an ongoing exploration of what lies beneath in terms of personal motivations and formal underpinning. Paul is co-director of DOLPH, a not-for-profit visual arts project in Streatham Hill, south London.

Sluice is an artist-run initiative which strategically adopts structures in order to showcase artist and curator-led projects and galleries. Sluice Project Space is made possible by Hackney Walk.
